Editor El Paso Herald:

Find enclosed money order for my subscription for the next three months, also I enclose a letter from a friend to you.

Yours respectfully,

Leavenworth, Kas., Sept. 16, 1910.

Jack P. Stewart.

San Marcial, N. M.

I have just returned from a vacation of six weeks and find a copy of The El Paso Herald, which you were kind enough to send.

It seems incredible that El Paso should be issuing a paper equal to the large metropolitan dailies.

I remember when El Paso was a comparatively small town, with apparently little to support it. I also recall, however, that an old time traveling man who went to work for Col. Abernathy, 40 years ago, was accustomed to predict that some day El Paso would be a great city and so after the lapse of many years it seems that his prophecy is being fulfilled.

Again thanking you, and with kindest regards, I am

Yours truly,

P. C. King.

Married Life the First Year

No. 17 Still the Most Wonderful Time By Mabel Herbert Urner

THE shrewdest nannies, cambrics, silk flannels and laces. Most of Helen's days were now spent in the buying and making up of these things. Over each dainty bit of material she thrilled with the joy and wonder which only a young wife knows.

"The Infants' Department." With what secret pride she would enter a large department store and ask to be directed to the "Infants' Department." And the show woman who waited on her—how charmingly she would be taken into her confidence. And the poor, weary, black gown woman who spent her life behind the counter—how interested and eager to help she would be.

"I want these just for little morning slippers, you know. They should be plain—shouldn't they?"

"Oh, yes," and the shop woman's tired face lit up with all a woman's interest. "They wash so much better if they're plain—and you'll need so many."

"Yes, that is what I thought—the plainest cambric slippers for the morning. And the finer dresses I'm going to make myself by hand—later, with a soft flush, "when I can't go out so much."

"Yes, I know," the woman murmured. "That is the way my sister did—and she so enjoyed making them."

Her Happiness Secure.

Her sister's child. That was probably the nearest to maternity this poor woman would ever come. And as she left the shop, Helen's eyes filled with tears as she thought of all these women waiting among counters and shelves the best of their lives—the best of their womanhood. Did their arms never ache, not only with lifting down and putting up goods, but with the longing to hold in them something of their own?

Surely even the tenement mothers with their droves of ill-kept children and drunken husbands had more of life—a woman's life—than these colorless, soul-starved women crouched in their trim black gowns.

Helen's own happiness had never seemed so secure as now. Warren's gentleness and tenderness almost swept from her memory those months of his irritability and selfishness. Parenthood—that was the rock on which their love was to be safely anchored at last.

Never had she waited with such joyous expectancy for him to come home in the evenings—and never had he come home with such promptness.

"And how is my little woman tonight?" was always his greeting now as he took her in his arms. "Has she been taking care—good care of herself?"

Their Evenings Together.

And she would smile up at him. "Oh, yes, such very good care."

"And what wonderful things has she bought today?"

"Oh, the dearest little—but no, you're not to see or be told of anything until after you've had your dinner."

"So I must have my dinner first?" you dictatorial little thing."

"Yes, I told Anna to have it ready so we could get through and have a long evening together."

Then when the dinner was over and he was settled in his big easy chair by the light, she would bring out the things she had bought or been working on that day.

His masculine ignorance and clumsiness were an unfailing source of delight to them both.

"And what's this?" pulling a bit of lace. "Is this what you call Hamburg edging?"

"No, no," she laughed. "You think everything is Hamburg edging. It's the only name you remember. I suppose because it reminds you of Hamburg steak. Material person," with a kiss.

"Well, what is this then?" still holding to the bit of lace.

"That," with her most intrusive air, which he loved, "that is Valenciennes narrow Valenciennes."

"And what is this?" it looks just the same, only straighter."

"That's the insertion; the other was the edge. You see, I am sewing them together like this—to put around a little yoke."

"But if you have to sew them together, why don't they make it that way?"

"He learns many things."

"Why, because—because"—this was disconcerting, for as she thought of all the lace and insertion she had sewed together she wondered why they didn't make it that way. "Because—it wouldn't be the same," lamely. "Now, don't ask puzzling questions."

He laughed. "All right, what's this string for?"

"Isn't it a string?" indignantly. "That's finishing braid to put over little seams."

"And this—are these buttonholes by the yard? And won't the buttons have to be rather large?"

"Oh, no, no, that's heading to run ribbon through. I'm going to put that around the neck and sleeves of this little slip, and then run in this narrow ribbon. Won't that be dainty and sweet?"

He drew her, laces, ribbons and all into his lap.

"Dear, it's all going to be very sweet."

That in this southern portion of this field, the greatest oil pools would be found. If these are facts and true, why should the state sell its lands that are subject to sale, for a song, and let some other fellow sing it. Stop the ridiculous idea of selling the "bottom" of lands already sold, and make a legitimate sale of the lands subject to sale and put a price on these lands according to their worth.

The ownership legitimately of from 100 to 200 acres of oil land is sufficient holdings for any company, and it is enough land to make every stockholder a fortune. Let the state get the permission of the Texas company to drop even 100 acres of oil in the capped well, which is well No. 2, and when done, you will see oil gushing to the height here also of 130 feet, and it will continue to flow until put under control the same well No. 2.

Let all of us who own land in this oil basin, get together and send able attorneys to Austin, who can and will show these good people the great wrong they are doing, by giving title to two ownerships of same land.

THE CANADIAN LABOR PROBLEMS

Grand Trunk Pacific on schedule time. From 5000 to 8000 more men could be utilized to good advantage. The Canadian authorities have agreed to remove all financial considerations from the importation of railroad laborers, and not require the usual $25 to $50 guarantee that the immigrant will be able to support himself.

An indication of the increased demand for labor is afforded by the building permits issued in Winnipeg during the month of May of this year and last. This year they call for construction valued at $11,250,000. Last year the amount of work called for was estimated at $7,500,000.

Don't Want English Labor.

One of the slogans of the laboring element in Canada has been "No English Need Apply." When Lord Northcliffe last visited Canada he preached a sermon which was as his text, reminding the Canadians that

WHY NOT?
 Santa Fe (N. M.) New Mexican.
 The Democratic and Socialistic Estancia Daily Herald demands a constitution that will permit the new state to go into the cement business, because cement at Estancia costs $1.25 per sack. Why not also into the newspaper business because newspapers sell at 5 cents apiece at Estancia and at only 1 cent in Philadelphia. Or in the grocery business because prices are higher at Estancia and Santa Fe than they are in London or Berlin.

ALAMO TO CLEAN UP.
 From the Otero County (N. M.) Advertiser.
 The Business Men's club has undertaken to clean the town up and keep it clean. Good shot. If the club will keep the town clean it will accomplish wonders—and here's hoping. D. M. Harringer has the job and he can do it, but he must have the moral and financial support of all—not a few—but all.
